

DID YOU KNOW?

About Our Goats

Our friendly goats are all rescues — saved from local goat dairy farms where male kids often have no use. Since dairies only need female goats (called does) to make milk, the boys (bucks and wethers) are sadly considered byproducts and are often slated for consumption. By giving them a home here, we give them a second chance at life — and a job they love!

All our goats are fixed males, called wethers. Wethers are calm, gentle, and make the best companions for humans because they don't have the hormonal behavior that bucks (intact males) or does (females in season) can have. Our goats are a mix of Nigerian Dwarf and Pygmy breeds — small in size but big in personality! They're known for their playful hops, curious noses, and friendly bleats.

Fun Facts

- Goats have rectangular pupils — this gives them nearly 360° vision!
- Their favorite snacks are weeds, blackberry vines, and tall grass.
- They love climbing and can balance on logs, stumps, or even your back!
- Baby goats are called kids, and a group of goats is called a herd.

Their Job on the Farm

Every animal at Howe Ranch has a purpose, and the goats' job is weed abatement and bringing joy in our petting zoo. They help clear unwanted brush and tall grass naturally — no machines or chemicals needed! After working hard in the pastures, they spend their days soaking up pets and hugs, and showing guests how smart and loving goats can be.

Why Goats Matter

By rescuing and caring for these gentle wethers, we teach compassion and sustainability — showing that every animal, even one once considered a byproduct, has a purpose in sustainable farming and can bring happiness, laughter, and precious moments to the farm.
